A State in Which No. Legal Separation of Husband and Wife Can be Had.

(Charleson, News.)

South Carolina is the only State in the union in which it is impossible to obtain a judicial divorce for any cause, and, while the people of South Carolina do not by any means claim to be any better than their neighbors, any more long-suffering, sweet-tempered, meek or ale absence of a divorce law has not injudicially a superior of the state. There never were two persons from Adam and Eve down, who coictly or the happiness of the people of the State. There never were two persons from Adam and Eve down, who constructed the state. There never were two persons from Adam and Eve down, who There always must be a certain amount of friction between people who, in many cases, have passed the greater part of their lives under totally different influences; who are of different temperament, who, however much they may love each other, cannot always remain blind to certain failings and peculiarities which are common to the most worthy men and women. There are moments in the lives of many married people when either feel momentarily that it would have been better for them had they never married. This feeling may be aroused by some veriest trifle, or it may have birth in what, for the time at least, seems but in the state of the people when the state of the stat

Mrs. Mary Clemmer Hudson once wrote of her early experiences: "I write one colournal." When the write one colourn per day on any subject I was instructed to write on, for three years. I had not for a single day failed to fulfill my task, which included everything from book review, comments on government, public men and affairs to a common advertisement paragraph. You there were not become a devertisement paragraph. You literary work. It was a tollsome time, but it cured me utterly of the mental perversity that waits for the inspiration of the creative moods to do what is necessary to be done."
